Provides two attached files - one summarising the UNSCOM knowledge on the phosgene / stabiliser plant at Al Qa Qaa, the other listing the tagged equipment.

Casting your mind back to Thursday's rushed little meeting, you will recall me pointing out that the phosgene plan was too small to be interesting, and regarded by UNSCOM as legit dual use. I was assured that rebuilding had gone on.

I also pointed out the bulk world usage of phosgene, and the small size of the unit. You will recall admitted they were grasping at straws.

My annotations are on draft - you'll remember was keen to relieve me of possession of the dossier at the end of the meeting!

So all in all - having read page 2 of the Guardian - I'm with the manager of Al Qa Qaa; "it is a pretty stupid mistake for the British to make"

Another example supporting our view that you and I should have been more involved in this than the spin merchants of this administration. No doubt you will have more to tell me as a result of your antics today. Let's hope it turns into tomorrow's chip wrappers.....
